

Finding the words once you know you were wrong

8 findings · 13-step checklist · 1 myth · 6 sources · cheatgrid.com

Say plainly that you were wrong, and name what you did. The hard part isn't the wording: it's that saying it out loud dents how you see yourself.

THE GOAL

You're aiming to be understood, not to produce a version so careful it stops meaning anything. Stop rewriting and send the one you already have.

CHECKLIST

The moment you're about to actually say it, or hit send.

- ☐ Stop rewriting the message or the script in your head. Use the version you already have.
- ☐ If you're doing this in person or by call, make sure you're somewhere they can actually hear you out.
- ☐ Open with one plain sentence naming what you did: "I did X, and it was wrong."
- ☐ If it was something small and there's a real reason, add it in one more sentence, right after, never before.
- ☐ If a "but" starts creeping into your apology, cut it and finish on your own fault, not theirs.
- ☐ Name the one concrete thing you're going to do to make it right.
- ☐ Stop there. Don't ask them to say it's fine, and don't ask them to forgive you.
- ☐ Let the silence sit. Don't fill it by explaining again or saying sorry a second time.
- ☐ If they push back on how you're describing it, don't argue the details; go back to owning your part.
- ☐ If they're not ready to respond, say that's fine and name when you'll check back in.
- ☐ Write down the fix you're about to make, somewhere you'll actually see it again, like your phone's notes or a to-do list.
- ☐ Put an actual date on when you'll follow through, like "by Friday," not "soon."
- ☐ If part of the fix can start right now, start it before the conversation ends.

THE THREE BIGGEST THINGS

- 1 Saying it plainly threatens how you see yourself as a decent person, not just the wording.
- 2 You are probably overestimating how bad this will feel, and underestimating the relief once it's done.
- 3 When you feel less close to someone, the apology you write tends to quietly fill with excuses, blame shifted back, or the harm played down.

Why this feels so much harder than it should

KNOW

Saying it plainly threatens how you see yourself as a decent person, not just the wording.

Admitting real fault forces a moment of seeing yourself as someone who did wrong, which most people resist. Source 1

KNOW

You are probably overestimating how bad this will feel, and underestimating the relief once it's done. People who only imagined apologizing predicted worse dread and less relief than people who had actually done it reported. Source 2

WATCH

When you feel less close to someone, the apology you write tends to quietly fill with excuses, blame shifted back, or the harm played down.

People who wanted less closeness with a friend wrote apologies coded as more defensive and less complete. Source 1

What the words actually need to carry

KNOW

Saying plainly that you were wrong outweighs everything else in the sentence. Ownership beat every other ingredient tested. Source 3

SAY

Reaching for a slightly longer, everyday word for your regret, in an otherwise identical sentence, reads as more sincere than the shortest word that means the same thing.

In a ranking task, longer wording came across as more apologetic than shorter phrasing with the same meaning. Source 4

DON'T

A rare or complicated word doesn't make you more sincere, only harder to follow.

Commonness made no difference to how apologetic a sentence seemed, so a rarer word buys nothing extra. Source 4

Whether saying it is the whole job

KNOW

Saying it plainly changes what someone says about forgiving you. Fixing the harm changes how they treat you.

People's words about forgiving shifted most after an apology, while their actual behavior shifted most after repair. Source 5

SAY

Pair the apology with an actual step to fix the harm, not just the words: that's what shifted how the person treated you, more than the apology alone did.

Pairing an apology with a real offer of repair moved people beyond words toward acting warmer afterward. Source 5

Myths worth retiring

MYTH

Giving the real reason why it happened will just sound like you're making an excuse, so leave it out and only say sorry.

ACTUALLY

For a small, genuinely explainable slip, this backfires: in a study, coworkers who explained why they were late were rated more worthy of help than ones who only apologized with no explanation. Source 6

Sources

1. <https://www.psychologicalscience.org/publications/observer/obsonline/why-sorry-seems-to-be-the-hardest-word.html>
2. https://irep.ntu.ac.uk/id/eprint/26085/1/PubSub3503_Leunissen_6398DUP.pdf
3. <https://news.osu.edu/the-6-elements-of-an-effective-apology-according-to-science/>
4. <https://theconversation.com/how-to-make-your-apology-more-effective-new-research-255730>
5. <https://www.sciencedaily.com/releases/2012/07/120718090551.htm>
6. <https://www.psychologicalscience.org/news/minds-business/too-late-to-apologize-unless-you-have-an-excuse-too.html>

Read it online, with the rest of the set

This page is one of the Life Skills pages on Apology and repair at CheatGrid. Each one pairs a short cheat sheet of sourced findings with a checklist of the steps you'd otherwise forget.

Open on cheatgrid.com